The desktop version is simple, I would use a hover click to reveal drop down text under each item. The tablet page will rely on video, I just have the feel that tablet users are more prone to sit through videos. The mobile version has stop down menus, although the buttons are large and easy to navigate.

This is the meat of my website. The Desktop version provides an all stop shop for the homeschool parents, without the distracting information that can pull one off task. This is designed so a parents can quicky know what it feels like outside, download educational material, connect with other parents, and get out and start doing. The Tablet page is made to be more scroll friendly. The phone version takes advantage of ones natural left and right vision patterns.

The reflections and resource page are developed, but I am not sure how I will best utilize it. I imagine links to community resources and testimonials from happy families.
